Instruction.

THE Normal method of educating enters largely into the idea and practice of this school. The recitations of the various classes are of a familiar and conversational character, conducted in a spirit of inquiry rather than of dogmatism, and in such a manner as to call forth the latent thought. Oral teaching is mingled freely with that derived directly from text-books. Mere knowledge is of little value. An accumulation of facts, however great, or an endless acquisition of formulas and rules, do not constitute the wealth of the intellect. They are but the materials, of no great account, except there be also ability to use them. Hence the importance of the analytical method of instruction, which investigates the reasons and uses of things, unfolding "the why and the wherefore" of every operation and assertion.

This method is rigidly adhered to, in order to reveal and elucidate great principles and general truths, without a knowledge of which all other attainments are superficial and meretricious. Such instruction alone will truly fit its recipient for practical life. One may have knowledge without it, but not WISDOM.

Examinations.

The different classes will be submitted to a number of committees for examination upon the regular days.

Each committee will be composed of three persons of competent acquirements, and will be required to publish their report, and forward a copy to the parents or guardian, of the pupil of the highest standing.

Conditions.

I.—No pupil will be received to the privileges of this school who is known to be of a bad character, either by organic tendency or acquired habit. This school is not designed to be a "Reform School."

II.—No pupil will be received at any other time than the commencement of a term, except by consenting to enter classes already formed.

III.—No pupil will be received for a less time than three months, unless the year shall expire before the termination of that time.

IV.—Every boarding pupil will be expected to comply with the following requisitions:—

1. To be supplied with a hair-brush and comb, tooth-brush and cake of Castile soap, four towels, a pair of slippers, an umbrella, blacking-brush and blacking.
2. To have all articles of clothing plainly marked.
3. To present the Principal with a complete list of articles brought to the school.

V.—Every pupil, whose average standing at the close of the second term of the year is not above two, will be remanded to a lower class.

VI.—Normal pupils may select such studies as may be deemed most suitable.
